Historical Sketch

William W. Vaughan and a group of like-minded citizens founded the Cambridge Social Union (CSU) in 1871. In the beginning it had a piano for musical entertainment, a lending library and reading room. Soon literacy and other classes were started, mostly taught by Harvard College students, as well as a Boys Club started by Anne W. Abbot. The CSU was incorporated in 1876, and that same year moved to 15 Brattle St. In 1889 the CSU again moved, to the William Brattle House at 42 Brattle St. During World War I the CSU suffered a decline in gifts and contributions as well as in services offered. In 1937 a feasibility study was conducted, and as a result in 1938 the CSU and the Boston Center for Adult Education started the Cambridge Center for Adult Education (CCAЕ), which offered evening courses. In 1941 the CCAЕ became an independently administered institution and Lydia Weare was made the Director. The CCAЕ almost closed in 1942 due to a lack of enrollment, but persevered another year and was quite successful throughout World War II. In 1948 Brattle Hall was sold in order to concentrate on developing the CCAЕ's educational facilities, and in 1972 the CCAЕ bought the Blacksmith House at 56 Brattle St. and the Dexter Pratt House at 1 Story St. from the Window Shop. As part of the sale, the CCAЕ agreed to keep the Window Shop bakery and its employees until they all retired. The CCAЕ is a non-profit organization that offers classes for adults ranging from cooking to foreign languages to computer programming and software.

Scope and Content

The collection includes the annual reports of the CSU from 1875-1916, CSU by-laws, records of meetings and members 1870s-1890s, business correspondence, program information, financial records, records of library accessions, two scrapbooks that contain mostly newspaper clippings, a sonnet by John Lothrop Motley, and a framed reproduction of a portrait of General William Brattle. This collection documents the early history and changes over time of an important and long standing Cambridge institution.
